THE STRANGE ANIMAL

The animals of Ace County were having an awful time. They just didn't know what to do. Never before had a problem like this come up. And they strutted back and forth searching for the answer.

"What to do? What to do?" muttered the owl wizard.

"I don't know! I don't know!" said the puzzled parakeet.

"We must do right," insisted the owl wizard.

"Right!" repeated the parakeet.

"So what do we do?" laughed the hyena.

"Gxmnb!" said the unknown animal that presented the problem.

All of them looked at this animal and he repeated, "Gxmnb!" Only louder.

"Oh, what kind of an animal are you?" asked the owl wizard. "Why can't you talk proper English? Why do you present such problems to we animals of Ace County?"

"Why?" repeated the parakeet.

"Zxcvdn!" insisted the strange animal.

"What was that he said?" asked the owl.

"Zxcvdn!" said the parakeet.

"Oh," said the owl. "This does not help us in the least. What can we do for this strange animal? We must treat him as kindly as we know how, yet we do not understand a word he says."

"Perhaps he speaks a foreign tongue," suggested the pretty smart squirrel.

"But of what nation?" said the owl.

"Lumenesia?" suggested the raccoon.

"He doesn't look Lumenese," said the owl.

"Ferdinandia?" asked the turtle.

"Hah!" laughed the owl. "Does this animal look Ferdinandian?"

"Fvnbcdm!" said the strange animal.

"Perhaps that is the name of his country!" laughed the hyena.

"What?" asked the owl.

"What he just said," said the raccoon.

"What did he just say?" asked the owl.

Each of the animals looked at each other. None of them could remember what this strange-talking animal had said.

"Perhaps he will repeat it," said the owl.

"Mnbdcfk!" said the strange animal.

"Was that it?" asked the owl.

"I don't know," said one and all.

The animals stopped talking for the moment. They decided to think this out in silence.

Meanwhile, the strange-talking animal was saying, "Fgjhlk kmnunmh yptghfd!"

Those last words brought a spark to the mind of the owl. "I think I may have the solution," he smiled.

"What is it? Speak up!" his friends said.

"I believe," started the owl, "this creature is frightened of us. And because of his fear, he can't say what he'd like to. Words just can't seem to form in his mouth."

"You mean his tongue is tied," asked the raccoon.

"In a manner of speaking," answered the owl. "So let's act casual and as friendly as possible."

They all agreed. Some came over to shake the animal's hand. Some offered the animal some food. And the hyena who was the friendliest of all came over and slammed the animal on his back...

"GULPPP!" went the animal as he was slammed, and...

POPPP!

A little frog popped out of his throat.

"Oh, thank you, thank you, thank you," said the animal. "That frog has been in my throat since last April. What a relief to have it out!"

All of the animals of Ace County started to laugh. The animal was not strange at all, and now he was able to talk right. But suddenly the laughing stopped. They heard the little frog say:

"Gfnkhjlk!"

IMP-POSSIBLE

"Look, Johnny, maybe there are some under here."

"Go on, Julie," laughed the boy, "you don't find Pixies in Gopher holes."

"How do you know?" was the answer. "So far you haven't found any anywhere."

And Johnny had to admit that this was true.

It had all started the night before when John's father had told the two children a story about Pixies, and Johnny had asked him whether there really were such creatures.

"Of course," his father had replied. "They're all around you."

"Well then," Johnny had asked, "why can't we see them?"

"You don't see Pixies excepting where they live," was the answer. And further questioning of Johnny's father brought out the fact that Pixies lived in the air, or under the sea, or in the forests. Naturally the two children couldn't search under the water or up in the air, but they could look in a forest.

And that's why, early the next morning the two of them quietly tip-toed out of the house and started on their search for pixies.

It was almost twelve o'clock when Julie located the 'gopher' hole, and Johnny had to admit that it was as good as any place to look, since they hadn't seen any pixies anywhere. So the two of them began to dig.

While they were digging, unknown to them, the children were being watched. Tiny little men dressed in brown suits and green hats were sitting all around—on top of trees, perched on flowers, under shade-stones. And they were talking and laughing among themselves.

"Now they're digging in a gopher hole to find us," one of them said. And all the others laughed, until suddenly one jumped off his perch, and began to shout excitedly.

"That's not a gopher hole," he said. "It's a snake hole."

With that, all the little men gathered together and made plans about how to save the children from the snake. Just as they were in the midst of their plans, Julie let out a scream. There staring her right in the face, was the snake. The little invisible men one after another piled into the snake hole. Then just as the snake was ready to strike—with its head pulled back, and its fangs ready to dart out—it returned to its hole.

"Wow," said Johnny, mopping his brow. "I thought he was going to bite. I guess he just wanted to come up and take a look around."

As the little men climbed out of the hole, one of them stopped and looked at Johnny.

"Just came up to take a look around, eh boy! Good thing for you we were able to pull him back down by the tail in time."

But of course Johnny couldn't see the little men or hear them.

At last it began to get dark, and Julie became hungry. Johnny picked some berries for her, but just before the little girl could put them in her mouth, a branch fell and almost hit her. She became so frightened that she dropped all the berries.

"Good thing we broke that branch in time to scare her," one of the little men said, "or else she'd have eaten that poisoned fruit."

Finally, Johnny decided that it was time to start back. He looked around him — but he couldn't remember which way he had come. All the paths looked the same.

"What's the matter, Johnny?" Julie asked.

"Oh, nothing." And realizing that he didn't want to frighten Julie any more than she already was, he pointed to a path where a green leaf was falling, and they started to walk.

And all the way home, whenever Johnny became confused, there was always a falling green leaf to attract his attention to the proper path.

On reaching his house, Johnny's father asked him where he'd been all day.

"Just looking for Pixies, Dad. But do you know, we couldn't find a single one. I guess today was a bad day to look."
